VETERANS OF TRENCHES DISLIKE TO TALK HORRORS OF THE WAR

(Herbert Corey, in Atlanta Journal) Paris, Jan. 7.—In time the war becomes unreal to the observer. At the front one sees tired and quiet men in wet ditches. They answer his questions respectfully or with lassitude. In the base towns one sees them on the streets or sitting head to head over their pots of thin beer or their wine glasses in some dirty albergo. There is never any real intimacy between them and an observer. Their interests are quite apart from his. Even when one gets well acquainted with a soldier, the fighting man does not want to recall the obscene filth of the trench, the horror of the crawling straw, the days and nights when the wet clothes freeze upon the skin. I know one young French soldier very well. He has fought since August, 1914, and the reminiscence he has volunteered came last night. "When I was in the legion," said he, "an Algerian one night mixed beer and whiskey and brandy and absinthe and niggerhead rum. Then he drank a lot of it." The story ended there, rather abruptly, as it seemed to me. After a decent interval, I prompted him. I wanted to know what had happened to the unfortunate Algerian. "Oh," said he, "I saw him crawling over the embankment about midnight with his knife in his teeth. Just before dawn he came back with a mil-trailleuse and two German heads." At the time the war was going on, perhaps, but "as a marché," as the French say. It goes on. One's rooms are not so well heated and the railway cars are packed like peach crates and the trains are unendurable and taxis are not. There is talk of high prices and the crises of tobacco and new taxes. Not much talk, nor violent talk. Each seems insulated against all others by his own little aura of sorrow and care. Then, as though during a night of troubled dreams, one springs broad awake at the call of a terrifying reality, one awakens to what war is. It comes home. The little circle of friends who have come back from time to time "on persuasion," frantically crowd into a few days memories that shall last them for another six months, is suddenly broken into.

André and Eve. "André hasn't heard from Eve for weeks now," said George last night. "Her letters have come back stamped 'not found.'"

No one knows why he is called "Eve." One of the handsome boys I have ever known, wise, lusty, soft black eyes and the poseless grace of a kitten. Rather a discontented face, on the whole. He resented the war, for it broke his plans and perhaps cost him his future. Even after he got his third citation he did not wear his cross when he came to town. That was "chi-chi," he said—swank, an English boy would have said. Then at the front one day a shell demolished the car he was driving and a bit of it struck his cross and bent it so that it rolled and sparkled on his breast. It delighted him. He was child-like in showing it.

"I shall never again be without it," said he. "The cross itself has been decorated."

And Albert, who went away half frantic four months ago, to go back to his tank. He was frightened, but he had been in a tank long enough to know what the order meant. Mon only lived six weeks in a tank, he said. He had the statistics of tank-life at the fingers' edge. He reeled off the names of men who had lived a day, a week, a month, two months. The average was but six weeks. He had already outrun the average. He made rather a fool of himself, his friends thought, when he went away, talked at random, and threw away his money and quarreled with the girl he was to marry. "So she should not worry about me," his friends excused it all.

"You know," they said to each other, "he is going back to the tanks."

The Girl Forgave Him. Albert had written in to say that he has been lucky. His wound is a very small one—just a smashed leg—and the doctor thinks he will not lose it, though he will always be lame. And so he is out of the tank forever. His letters are almost incoherent with sheer joy, for, after all, the girl did worry about him and refused to keep on quarrelling, and the railroads had been effected before the wound came, and they will love each other very dearly. Albert is especially glad of that. If he had been wounded before the girl forgave him, he would always have feared that she had been moved by pity.

Just to set Albert's case straight, it may be mentioned that the wound was worth a second palm on his cross. Although his tank looked like nothing so much as a rusty tin can that had been run over by a wagon after the German shell hit it, he managed somehow to shoot through the mitrailleuse and crawl out with it—there was no other living man in the tank then, and the blood with which he was smeared was not his own—and fight off a wave of Germans until the French came. It was while fighting the mitrailleuse that his thigh was smashed. Albert himself says he is not a coward.

"I did not want to die," is his reasoning. "I was half mad at the thought of being taken from this good world by a German beast, but I was not a coward. I was frightened many times, of course, but I was never a coward."

The coffee man is dead, now. We heard that last night. He was never a friend of ours, precisely—just a poor little devil of a French soldier, who had never heard from his father or mother or sisters or sweetheart from the day the Germans swept into northern France. Rather a quiet chap, with a friendly smile under his little blond mustache. We called him the coffee man because he always rose at 5 o'clock in the caserne in which he was spending his convalescence to make coffee for a roomful of forty. We met him through one of the forty, who is a friend.

Because He Had Shell Shock. "You see," he explained, casually, "the friend I cannot sleep at night. While it is dark he cannot close his eyes. Just lies there on the blanket and waits. At 5 o'clock he makes the coffee. He likes to do it, he says, because he looks forward to during the night."

By day he slept a little, when the sun shone or when the cook was in good humor, so that he could coil down in a corner of the caserne kitchen, where the electric light shone reassuringly all day long. But he could not endure the existence in the caserne. The surgeons told him that he was not yet cured, but he nodded his head understandingly. There was a little glint of humor in his blue eyes and in the smile under his blond mustache. He preferred the front, he said. Yesterday the cook at the caserne got a letter from the coffee man's sergeant.

"He said that he wanted you to know," the sergeant wrote. "He said that you had been so kind—"
